

MAKING THE GRADE

EFFECTIVE TEACHING IN EVERY CLASSROOM

‘Race to the Top’ Will Aid Pennsylvania’s Efforts to Boost Teacher Effectiveness

Pennsylvania’s ongoing efforts to put an effective teacher in every classroom received a welcome boost recently from the U.S. Department of Education.

Just days ago, Pennsylvania was awarded $41.3 million in federal “Race to the Top” funding to pursue innovations in K-12 public education. Governor Tom Corbett said “a significant focus” of the funding will be statewide implementation of more substantive, meaningful methods for evaluating teachers.

Improved teacher evaluations are a key component of improving teacher effectiveness. High-quality evaluations help teachers identify their classroom strengths, as well as areas where more work is needed, and they give teachers the direction required for professional growth.

The state Department of Education already has signed up more than 100 education entities, including about 80 school districts, for a new teacher and principal evaluation pilot program that begins this year. The “Race to the Top” funds will help advance that effort.

The goal of the pilot is to build a meaningful evaluation system that can help educators and students reach their full potential in the classroom. Information and feedback from the pilot program will be used to develop a more robust evaluation system that can be used statewide in the 2012-13 school year.

The new year promises to be a pivotal one for improving teacher effectiveness. The challenge in the months ahead will be to build on our progress so we can ensure every child in every classroom benefits from an effective teacher.
