

PA's Child Care Crisis: A Growing Economic Problem

$285 Million - Annual Cost to PA's Transportation/ Warehousing Sector

For Pennsylvania, inadequate child care options for children under age 5 impose substantial and long-lasting consequences; effects are felt by working parents and businesses, as well as taxpayers. The top-line findings of a new study quantify the economy-wide impacts of Pennsylvania's inadequate child care system. The result: an annual economy-wide cost of $4.9 billion to working parents and $1.5 billion to Pennsylvania businesses (in lost earnings, productivity, and revenue); as well as a $1.3 billion loss in Pennsylvania tax receipts.

Growing cost burdens Pennsylvania's economy due to gaps in the child care system

Dec. 2022 to Dec. 2025

Parents	$4.1 Billion → $4.9 Billion
Businesses	$1.5 Billion → $1.5 Billion
Taxpayers	$1.0 Billion → $1.3 Billion

*Note - the total cost burden to Pennsylvania's economy due to gaps in the child care system is $6.4 billion annually. The taxpayer cost burden is a subset of parent cost burden and should not be individually counted as part of the total. It is noted separately above in accordance with standard benefit-cost analysis reporting.

For Pennsylvania's transportation/warehousing sector, the total annual economic cost of inadequate child care is $285 million. This figure reflects an average annual loss of $4,290 per working parent in this sector (primarily in lost earnings and job search costs); and businesses in this sector lose $1,350 per working parent in the form of reduced revenue and extra hiring costs. In total, working parents in the sector lose $217 million and the sector's businesses lose $68 million every year. Additionally, PA taxpayers lose $56 million annually in lost tax revenue from the impact to the transportation/warehousing sector.

Beyond its impact on the workforce and economy today, Pennsylvania's child care crisis damages the future workforce by depriving children of nurturing, stimulating environments that support healthy brain development while their parents work.

Policymakers must help working families find and afford high-quality care and ensure that our commonwealth has a robust child care sector to better serve them. Such efforts will certainly include continued investment (both public and private). Doing so will improve life outcomes for Pennsylvania's children today and strengthen the commonwealth's workforce and economy both now and in the future.

*Economic cost analyses are based on a Zogby Analytics survey of working parents in Pennsylvania with children under the age of 5. The survey asked a series of questions to gauge how inadequate child care affects parents' work, including (but not limited to): turning down opportunities, distractions/productivity challenges and, worst-case, quitting or being fired. Survey data included information by economic sector allowing for sector-specific results and cost analyses. Challenges finding high-quality, affordable child care varies by sector based on differences in average earnings, location of work, and shift hours.
